Some of the finest houses in Cardiff stand within a few minutes' walk of Roath Park Lake. Around the park and up into Penylan, larger Edwardian and Victorian villas with bay windows, deep valleys and tall chimney stacks line the roads off Wellfield Road and Cyncoed Road. These roofs are handsome, but they're also far more involved than a simple terrace, and they need roofers in Cardiff who understand how every part fits together. Redland Roofing Cardiff, a family-owned business with over 30 years in the trade, works on roofs like these across north and central Cardiff. Bay windows are one of the defining features of an Edwardian villa, and each bay has its own small roof. Some are slated, some are covered in lead, and all of them meet the main wall with a flashing that has to stay watertight. When that joint fails, water can run down inside the wall and show up as damp around the window frame, a long way from the actual cause. Redland Roofing Cardiff carries out lead work and lead joint repairs, replacing tired lead so the bay sheds water properly again. A careful inspection makes all the difference here, and thorough inspection is a theme that comes up in the firm's Google reviews. Larger roofs usually mean more valleys, where two slopes meet and channel rainwater down to the gutter. Leaves from the trees around Roath Park and the leafy streets of Penylan settle in those valleys every autumn, holding water against the lead and the slates on either side. Tall stacks bring their own problems too, with cracked mortar and loose pots after south-westerly gales. The team handles chimney repair and repointing, chimney removal where a stack is no longer needed, and gutters, fascias and soffits. It's a short drive from the Rumney base along Newport Road and up through Penylan, so these streets are well within easy reach.

Owners of bigger homes often want to see what's going on up there, because a three-storey roof is hard to judge from the garden. Customers regularly mention receiving before-and-after photos and videos during a job, so you can check the condition of your valleys Cardiff roofers and flashings for yourself. The business holds a 4.8 Google rating from 204 reviews, is fully insured for residential roofing, and backs its workmanship with a guarantee.
