

Order flowers for an overseas Father's Day after checking the date in your recipient's country, since it is not the same everywhere. Aim to place the order at least a week ahead, and allow more time if the address is remote or delivery options are limited.

Check the local date first

Father's Day falls on the third Sunday in June in several countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom. In Australia, it is observed on the first Sunday in September. Germany observes Father's Day on Ascension Day, a public holiday whose date changes each year.

Use the date where your recipient lives, not the date on your own calendar. Check the year as well, because the numbered date changes. If you are arranging flowers for someone who celebrates a different country's tradition, ask which day matters to them or choose the date your family usually observes.

Choose a delivery day and order early

A local florist in the recipient's country can prepare flowers close to the delivery address. That avoids the uncertainty of sending fresh flowers across a border yourself. Check that the florist delivers to the specific address and offers the day you want before you settle on an arrangement.

Ordering a week ahead is a useful starting point, not a guarantee. For a rural address, a public holiday, or a florist with limited delivery days, contact the florist earlier and ask what lead time is needed. If the date is close, check the available delivery slots before writing your card or choosing flowers.

Sunday delivery may not be available everywhere. A Saturday delivery can be a good alternative, especially if you want the flowers there for the start of Father's Day. If your recipient will be away for the weekend, choose a day when someone can accept the arrangement. You can also ask the florist what happens if nobody answers the door.

Give the florist the full local address, including any apartment number, postal code, and access instructions. A recipient's phone number can help resolve a delivery problem, though it may make the surprise less certain. Add your name to the card so the recipient knows who sent the flowers.

Common questions

Should I send flowers on Father's Day itself?

If delivery is offered and your recipient will be home, the day itself is a natural choice. The day before is also thoughtful and may give you more delivery options.

What if I have missed the date?

Send them when you can and include a brief note. Acknowledge the late arrival without letting the apology take over your message.

Does the time difference affect my order?

It can affect the order cutoff. Check the florist's local time and stated deadline, especially if you are ordering near the end of the day.

Can I send flowers to a workplace?

Yes, if the workplace accepts deliveries. Check its opening hours and include the recipient's department or other details the florist needs to find them.
