

Discuss removal and cleanup alongside the main landscape task. A proposal is easier to compare when it explains both what will be changed and how the area will be left after the agreed work.

Identify what may be removed

Describe existing materials, planting or personal items relevant to the proposed work. Separate items you want retained from those under discussion for removal. Ask which decisions still need assessment rather than assuming that everything within the work area will be taken away.

Ask about handling

Discuss how removed material and ordinary work debris are addressed in the proposal. Clarify which responsibilities belong to the contractor and which belong to you. Avoid relying on a general promise that an area will be tidy when the meaning of that phrase has not been agreed.

Define the finished condition

Ask what condition the affected area is expected to be in at handoff. Keep any exclusions and remaining tasks visible. If the project is staged, discuss cleanup at each yard design guidance handoff instead of treating the final stage as the only point when access and use matter.

Keep the next decision clear

Keep the practical arrangements close to the design notes. Access, retained features and later care can affect how the proposal is understood, even when they do not form its main illustration.
