If your phone used to last all day and now needs a charger by lunchtime, the cause is usually one of two things, an ageing battery or something on the software side that is working harder than it should. Telling the two apart is the key to fixing it, and it is a common reason people search for mobile phone repair near me.

Start with the cheap checks. Screen brightness is the biggest drain on most phones, so lower it or switch on automatic brightness. Look in your battery settings to see which apps are using the most power, and close or remove any that run constantly in the background without good reason. Poor signal also eats charge, because the phone keeps boosting its antenna to hold a connection, so a handset that struggles in a weak area will drain faster than one on a strong signal. A restart and a software update are worth doing as well, since both can clear misbehaving processes. Turning off features you rarely use, such as constant location access or push email, can also give back a surprising amount of battery life.

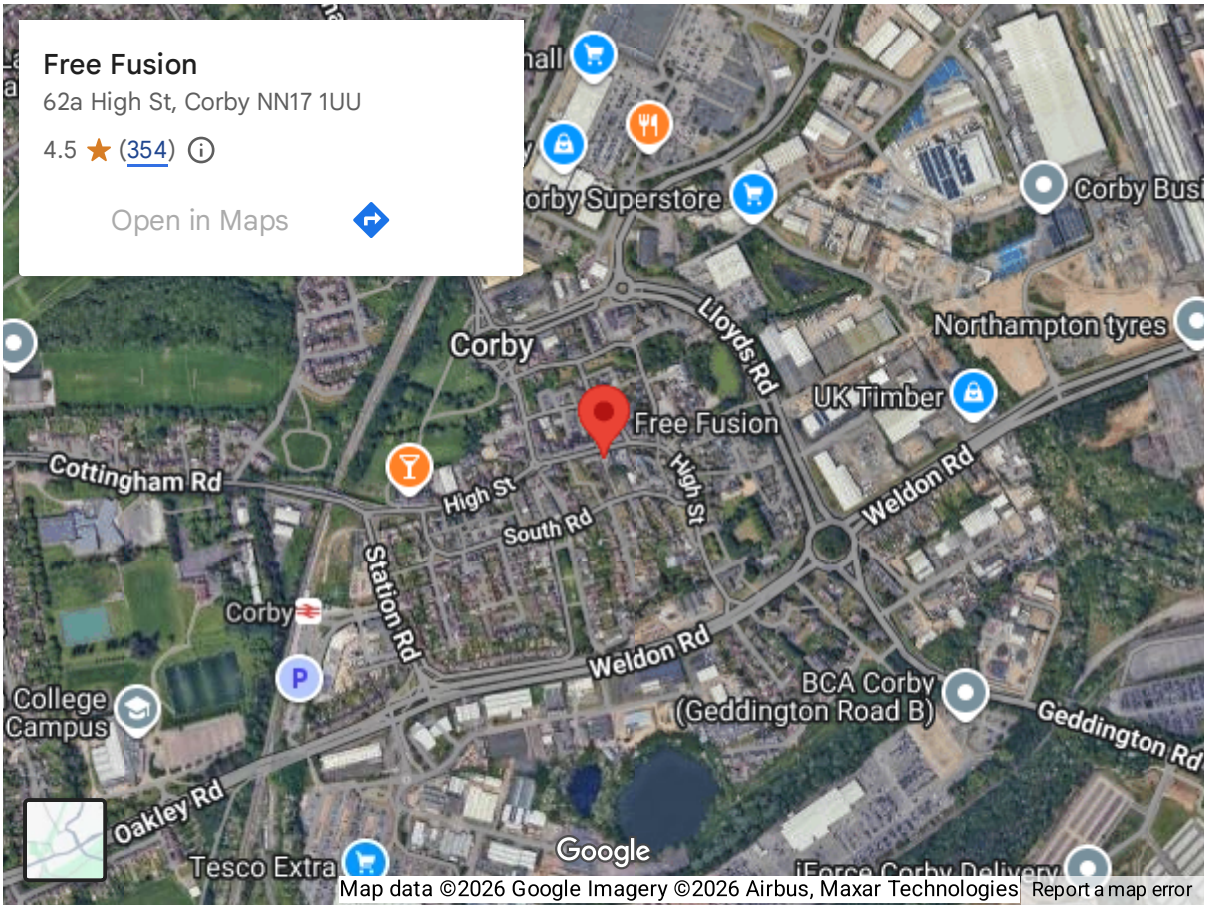

If none of that helps, the battery itself is the likely culprit. Batteries wear with every charge cycle, and after a couple of years of daily use they simply cannot hold what they once did. Typical signs include a percentage that falls quickly, a phone that switches off at thirty or forty per cent, a case that feels unusually warm while charging, or in rare cases a back panel that looks lifted. A swollen battery should not be ignored, so stop using the phone and have it looked at promptly.
