

To pay for a plant delivered to another country, choose a seller that delivers in the recipient's area and use a payment method it accepts. Before paying, check the final amount, delivery details, and any currency conversion your payment provider may apply.

Choose a seller near the recipient

A plant seller based in the destination country may be a practical place to start. Enter the recipient's address or postal code to see if delivery is available there. Some sellers cover only certain towns or neighborhoods, even if their website is available internationally.

Look at the plants available for delivery to that address. Living plants can be delicate, and a local seller may be able to deliver one without sending it across an international border. If you choose a seller outside the destination country, check its shipping terms carefully, as plants may be subject to import rules.

Give yourself time to read the delivery information before selecting a plant. Availability and delivery dates can depend on the location and the item you choose.

Check how you can pay

At checkout, the seller will show its accepted payment methods. These may include a credit or debit card or an online payment service. A card issued in another country is not always accepted, so check the seller's payment information if you are unsure.

You will usually need to provide your own billing details as well as the recipient's delivery details. Enter the billing address associated with your payment method, even though the plant is going somewhere else. Your payment provider may also ask you to confirm the purchase.

If a payment is declined, check the details you entered and contact your payment provider if needed. Avoid submitting the payment repeatedly without checking first, as it may be unclear whether an earlier attempt went through.

Review the total and currency

The price may be shown in the destination country's currency. Before confirming payment, look for the full order total, including delivery and any other charges shown at checkout.

- Check which currency the seller will charge.
- Ask your card issuer or payment provider about conversion rates and possible foreign transaction fees.
- Read the delivery terms and any cancellation or refund policy.
- For a plant crossing a border, check who is responsible for any import charges or required paperwork.

The amount on your payment statement may differ from the figure you expected if your provider converts the currency or adds a fee. The seller and your payment provider can explain the charges they control.

Confirm the recipient's details

Use the address format requested by the seller and include the postal code, building number, and any apartment details. Check the recipient's phone number too, since the delivery service may need to contact them. If the plant is a surprise, consider a delivery date when someone is likely to be available.

After paying, save the order confirmation. It should give you a record of the purchase and a way to follow up with the seller if a delivery detail needs attention.

A little checking before payment can make an overseas plant gift feel much simpler.

Related reading: more info